EXPERT OPINION:

Stay connected while expressing your truth

Dear C.O,

You are at a delicate intersection in your life. You have just begun building your professional identity as a communications assistant, yet you are being urged to commit to marriage. The tension you feel is not only about finding a husband; it is about timing, autonomy, comparison and your right to grow at your own pace.

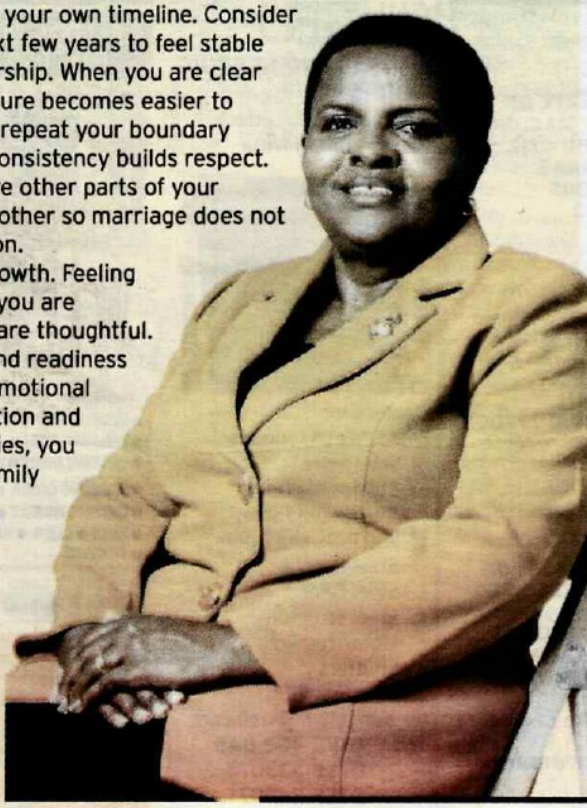
Psychologically, your reaction is understandable. Repeated conversations about marriage, especially when they feel unequal compared to your sister's situation, can create anxiety and self-doubt. You may wonder whether you are behind or disappointing. At the same time, you are adjusting to a new career and developing adult confidence. These are major life tasks. Avoiding your mother may feel protective because it reduces immediate stress, but it does not resolve the underlying pressure. What you need most is clarity about your readiness and reassurance that your timeline is valid.

As this continues, the relational layer becomes clearer. Your mother likely believes she is acting in your best interest. She may fear societal expectations or assume your sister's medical career justifies delay while yours does not. It may feel unfair, but understanding her perspective helps you respond calmly. The goal is not to argue, but to stay connected while expressing your truth. Instead of accusing her of pressure, explain how the repeated topic affects you and that you are still establishing yourself. When you acknowledge her concern and then state your position clearly, you lower defensiveness and increase understanding.

Over time, this situation calls for differentiation which entails staying emotionally connected while maintaining your identity. Differentiation is neither rebellion nor compliance. It is the strength to say: "I respect you, and I respect myself." Rather than competing with your sister's timeline, focus on your own path. Her delay does not diminish yours, and your career does not invalidate your need for time. Emotional maturity means owning your decisions without cutting off relationships.

Moving forward, define your own timeline. Consider what you need in the next few years to feel stable and prepared for partnership. When you are clear internally, external pressure becomes easier to manage. You can calmly repeat your boundary without anger or guilt. Consistency builds respect. At the same time, nurture other parts of your relationship with your mother so marriage does not dominate your connection.

This season is about growth. Feeling unready does not mean you are immature; it means you are thoughtful. Marriage is not a race, and readiness cannot be forced. With emotional clarity, calm communication and firm, but loving boundaries, you can honour both your family and yourself.



CLEMENCE BYOMUHANGI, MENTAL HEALTH AND PSYCHOSOCIAL COUNSELLING PSYCHOLOGIST