Education should not be commercialised

Education these days is more of a business than a social service to educate society. This is seen at all levels of education for example, most private primary schools pay large sums of money rendering them affordable only to the rich. Those who cannot afford have no choice but to resort to half-baked education in most UPE schools. This causes a great divide. The rich turn out to be more educated and better groomed compared to those who cannot afford.

Some schools have affordable fees but do not train children well. Their services leave a lot to be desired. Maybe there should be a regulation in regard to how much schools charge and what they teach. Those found wanting should be closed.

Nicholas Ahebwa,
nicholaspivioselector@gmail.com

JOIN THE DEBATE:

Scanned with CamScanner