

Ideology training a necessity

EDITOR: The Minister for Kampala, Betty Kamywa, mobilising councillors to go to Kyankwanzi for a seminar on political leadership doesn't mean indoctrination.

However, this is not true because the political education leadership course at Kyankwanzi enhances ones understanding on matters of national interests and in-depth analysis using philosophical principles such as objectivity and historical analysis.

This enables any leader to know that things don't occur in isolation, but they are interlinked or interrelated. Therefore, the mind set of some councillors may be misguided and not beneficial for the people they lead. Kyankwanzi is a national leadership centre that can benefit all leaders irrespective political party or ideology.

The benefits of undergoing the ideological course cannot be underestimated, as it includes love for your country, selfless, logical reasoning, negation skills, unity and open criticism, among others.

The political thought is about our ability to understand our problems and being able to solve them in our group life and organisation. Unlike animals that are instinctive, humans are usually coming up with complex answers to complex questions.

Therefore, political thought is human thinking of all time which requires being refreshed regularly to suit the dynamics of changing human behaviour. In other wards, the idea of KCCA councillors attending ideological seminars in Kyankwanzi should be received with a positive mindset.
