

Women crucial in agriculture

Agriculture accounts for more than half of the women workforce in Uganda's economic backbone, according to Jude Ssebuliba, the programmes manager of Food Rights Alliance (FRA).

"The country must recall that despite global commitment to halve hunger and malnutrition by 2019, within the framework of millennium development goals, hunger has persisted and even grown to worse a level that's why involvement of women is important," said Ssebuliba during the launch of a report about situation of hunger in Uganda.

According to him, the zero challenge recognises the need to make food systems sustainable from production to consumption.

— By Tom Brian Angurini