The beauty of the Kfm-sponsored 'Pablo Live Comedy' monthly show is that it nurtures and gives a chance to upcoming comedians to explore their talent.

Last Friday, comedy lovers witnessed a new breed of comedians who left most of them with 'broken' ribs from their funny jokes.

A case in point is Agnes Akite, an upcoming comedienne who took fans down memory lane with jokes from secondary school.

"At school, teachers knew that I was a noise maker in class. One time I was sent back home for school fees balance. When I came back some day in the morning, I found that the class monitor had written my name among the noise makers. Even when I told the teacher that I had been home the previous day, he still caned me," Akite recalled, pushing the crowd into loud laughter.

Okello Okello, another up and coming comedian made fun about his skin complexion. "In this world, I have suffered. One time I was arrested by a police officer late in the night. When he asked me for any identification, I gave him my identity card. He looked at it and told me but you man, this identity card has no photo. He could not see my face on the identity card because of my dark colour," Okello started, attracting loud cheers from the audience. He went on and on. The show also featured Miss Social Media, Ruth Mwima, who, Kenneth Kimuli, commonly known as Pablo challenged on how Ugandans managed to discover virtual private network (VPN) when social media was turned off on voting day. Uncle Bob and The Fire Host band treated the audience with live band music.
