KCCA and Nema, explain city floods

I convey my disappointment to the government, especially Kampala Capital City Authority and the National Environment Management Authority for turning the capital of Uganda a mockery of a city. With such established authorities in place, why would most parts of the city and roads flood during rainy season? Do we have non-professionals as policy makers and technocrats managing these authorities? Why have they failed to draw and construct appropriate drainage plan for the city? Or is it the right time for the government to declare another capital city of Uganda that is suitable, conducive and safe for tourists, traders and investors during the rainy season?

Kampala is now a mockery of the nation's capital city. The way out to make Kampala a better place to live in is to address the infrastructural challenges it faces. But a good start should be for government to build another capital city and leave Kampala as a commercial city.
