

practi-
staff.

UCU offers quality oil & gas courses

BY STEPHEN OTAGE

sotage@ug.nationmedia.com

KAMPALA. The Institute of Petroleum Studies (IPS) has said its partnership with Uganda Christian University (UCU) to train oil and gas courses is beginning to bear fruits because of the improving quality of programmes.

Speaking at the third graduation ceremony last week, Mr Patrick Ruharuzi, the chief executive officer IPS Kampala, said their quality of training is improving because they are now able to adjust and adapt to changes in the oil and gas sector immediately they occur.

"You have to strike a balance between the academic side and the practical side because we are competing with the global market place thus the need to have the global perspective and exposure the ever changing environment," he said.

He added that there is need to continue building technical skills because the institute and the university are mainly focusing on training oil and gas management and legal skills which are very much needed.

Last week, UCU held its 18th graduation ceremony where 1136 students graduated with different honours from various disciplines.

Female audience

According to Konde, the ma Uganda and S ship is intende geographical designed for f

She said: "I to realise that with Multich elevate conte ences. The v to be inspire spirational

Ne

MBARA

mism ar and resi the con modern about t

This than 71 comm rara Ir will t years struc

Th unde ture and Ban M Lw: